BEFORE: Louis M. Zigman, Esq. - Arbitrator

APPEARANCES:

For the Postal Service: Susan Johnson

For the Union: Charlie Miller

Place of Hearing: Pomona, CA

Date of Hearing: March 6, 1998

Briefs Received: May 6, 1998

Date of Award: May 9, 1998

AWARD:

That the supervisor's conduct vis a vis the three grievants constituted violations of the collective bargaining agreement, although the violations were minor in nature. Because the conduct of the supervisor was not egregious in nature, the question of corrective action, if any, should be remanded to the Service.

Introduction

This matter was heard by Louis M. Zigman, Esq., neutral arbitrator on March 6, 1998, in Pomona, CA. The Postal Service was represented by Susan Johnson and the Union was represented by Charlie Miller.

Both parties were afforded an opportunity to present evidence and to examine witnesses. After the close of the hearing both parties submitted written closing briefs and the matter stood as submitted on May 6.

The matter stood as submitted as of May 1998.

Based on the evidence and contentions of the parties, I issue the following decision and award.

Statement of the Case

These three grievances all involve allegations of inappropriate conduct by supervisor, Ruth Walton.

According to the union, Walton acted in an inappropriate and in an abusive manner to three different employees, Sherrie Walker, Eddie Reed and Donald Hynes. The union asserted that Walton's conduct violated the Joint Statement on Violence and Section 1154 of the M-39.

The Service denied that Walton's conduct constituted a violation of either the joint Statement or of the M-39.

These grievances, which had been filed as separate grievances, on June 30, 1994; October 31, 1995; and September 24, 1996 respectively, were eventually consolidated for the purposes of the hearing.
Material Facts

Sher'rie Walker filed her grievance (F94N-4F-C96018527) on June 30, 1994 over an incident which occurred on June 16, 1994. After her allegations against Walton, the postmaster, Penny Stevenson, conducted an investigation. After she completed her investigation, Stevenson issued Walton a letter of warning. In the letter of warning Walton was informed that she had engaged in unprofessional conduct; that she spoke abruptly and discourteously to Walker; and that she escalated the situation into a confrontation. Walton was cautioned that the Service considered her conduct as a serious offense and that was the reason she was given the letter of warning. Apparently the union and/or the gdid not believe that this warning was sufficient inasmuch as the union continued to process the grievance through the grievance procedure.

On October 23, 1995, approximately sixteen months later, there was another incident between Walton and Carrier, Eddie Reed. Reed filed a grievance in which he alleged that when he and Walton were discussing his request for 45 minutes of overtime that she "got into his face" and that she yelled and berated him.

As a result of what he perceived was highly inappropriate conduct, Reed contacted his union and he filed a timely grievance against her.

Eleven months later, on September 24, 1996, Donald Hynes filed a grievance against Walton too,

According to Hynes, Walton yelled and berated him when he told her that he had to go home because he was not feeling well.
As noted above, these three grievances were eventually consolidated and all three were heard on March 6, 1998.

The evidence also disclosed that in each of these three grievances the union asserted that Walton's conduct constituted a violation of the Joint Statement and of the M-39, Section 1154.

Testimony

Testimony from the witnesses differed in certain respects.

In regard to the Walker incident, Walker testified that Walton yelled at her and that Walton pushed and struck her with her hand. Walker's testimony was corroborated in certain areas by Lynette Sue Keebler and by Louis Mir.

On the other hand, Walton denied pushing and/or striking Walker. Walton's testimony was corroborated in part by Margo Vasquez.

With respect to the incident involving Eddie Reed, Reed's testimony was corroborated in part by Leo Martinez, Adriana Santander and Thomas Padron. Walton, on the other hand, asserted that Reed exaggerated and mis-characterized the incident.

With respect to the incident involving Donald Hynes, there were no percipient witnesses as to what occurred, other than Hynes and Walton.

Issue

Did Ruth Walton's conduct constitute a violation of either the Joint Statement on Violence in the Work Place or in violation of Section 1154 of the M-39?

If so, what is the appropriate remedy?
Positions of the Parties

Union's Position

The Union asserted that Walton's conduct on three separate occasions, involving Walker, Reed and Hynes, constituted inappropriate conduct by a supervisor and furthermore that her conduct constituted a violation of the provisions of the Joint Statement and/or of the M-39 Section 1154.

In this regard, the Union asserted that Walton's actions in yelling and berating these individuals constituted abusive and bullying conduct and therefore inappropriate conduct by a supervisor. More particularly, the Union asserted that this conduct not only violates the "mutual respect" provisions in the M-39 but it constitutes harassment and intimidation in violation of the principles as set forth in the Joint Statement on Violence.

While noting Walton's explanations and characterization to the effect that she had done nothing wrong and it was the three carriers, not her, who had engaged in inappropriate conduct, the Union pointed out that the Service itself concluded that Walton had engaged in misconduct with respect to Walker's situation. In this regard, the Union noted that Walton received a letter of warning for her misconduct.

While acknowledging that the Service did act properly in disciplining Walton, nevertheless the Union maintained that given the seriousness of Walton's actions that the letter of warning was not sufficient.

As support for this position, the Union pointed out that despite this letter of warning Walton continued to engage in similar misconduct; i.e. conduct vis à vis Reed and Hynes.
While also noting Walton's explanations as to her conduct involving the Reed and Hynes incidents, the Union maintained that her recollection and characterization of her conduct was inconsistent and in conflict with both Reed and Hynes as well as the testimony of other bargaining unit employees.

In view of the foregoing, and in noting that there were other incidents of yelling by Walton at other carriers, the Union maintained the other witnesses did support and corroborate Reed and Hynes' recollections as to what had occurred. As such, the Union asserted that Reed and Hynes testimony was more credible than the denials by Walton.

Furthermore, in noting that there were at least three incidents along with other similar complaints, the Union asserted that it is evident that Walton's conduct was not isolated and/or taken out of context.

The Union also asserted that Reed and Hynes' credibility should also be enhanced by their very positive record of service and by their tenure.

In view of the foregoing, the Union maintained that the evidence demonstrated that Walton's conduct constituted violations of the Joint Statement and of the M-39 and therefore a finding of misconduct should be made along with an appropriate remedy.

In terms of remedy, the Union withdrew the corrective action which it requested in each of the individual grievances and left the question of remedy to the arbitrator.

In asserting that the arbitrator does have authority to issue remedial action, the Union requested a finding that the Service violated the collective bargaining agreement, postal regulations and the Joint Statement, in the manner in which Walker treated these grievants. The Union also requested a directive that the Service cease and desist from allowing its supervisors to harass and/or abuse their subordinate employees.

For all of these reasons the union maintained that each of the grievances should be sustained.

Service's Position

The Service denied that Walton's conduct on any of the dates in question constituted a violation of either the Joint Statement and/or of the M-39.

While acknowledging that Walton was given a letter of warning with respect to the incident with Walker in June, 1994, the Service maintained that her conduct did not rise to the level of a violation of either the Joint Statement or of the M-39. In this regard, the Service asserted that Walton was reprimanded because she allowed the situation with Walker to escalate instead of her having taken professional action in mollifying Walker's conduct.

With respect to the incident involving Reed and Hynes, the Service asserted that both Reed and Hynes exaggerated and mis-characterized the incidents. Even assuming arguendo that Walton raised her voice, the Service maintained that those incidents were rather minimal and that they did not rise to the level of inappropriate conduct.

As support for this position, the Service pointed to Walton's testimony and to the Stevenson's testimony as to the fact that there is often some degree of conflict when supervisors and their carriers are "negotiating" overtime. According to the Service, both Reed and Hynes were upset by Walton's decisions and they argued with Walton. And, the Service acknowledged that while there may have been some arguing on both sides, the Service maintained that Walton's actions did not rise to the level of violence as contemplated by the Joint Statement nor did her conduct constitute a violation of Section 1154 of the M-39.

In this respect, the Service stated:

"Some level of conflict occurs in the workplace on a daily basis, the incident at issue did not rise to the level to violate the Joint Statement or any contractual violation. Supervisors must have latitude, within the bounds of reasonableness to supervise and direct employees. Clearly Article 3 gives management the right to direct employees and to maintain the efficiency of the operations entrusted to it."

In view of the foregoing, the Service maintained that the Union failed to establish its burden of proof in demonstrating that Walton's conduct constituted a violation of the Joint Statement and/or of the M-39. Moreover, with respect to the incident involving Walker, the Service asserted that it took appropriate action to correct that situation.

For these reasons, and in noting that Walton is no longer assigned to the Pomona Post Office and is not supervising craft employees, the Service maintained that the three grievances should be dismissed; citing awards of arbitrators Axon, Eaton, Rehmus and one of the previous awards of the undersigned.

Analysis and Conclusion

In analyzing grievances where the Union essentially alleges misconduct against supervisors, I believe that it is appropriate to hold the Union to much the same standard with respect to the burden of proof as the Service has when the Service takes disciplinary action against a bargaining unit employee. In other words, when weighing the quantum of proof, the Union must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the manager/supervisor's conduct constituted a violation of either the Joint Statement and/or of the M-39.

In assessing the first incident involving Walker, in June 1994, the evidence is undisputed that after management completed its investigation that it did conclude that Walton's conduct constituted a violation of the supervisory standards. Because of that conclusion the Service did issue disciplinary action.

In reviewing the level of discipline, I note that arbitrators generally refrain from substituting their judgment for management except in situations when the arbitrator concludes that the discipline constituted arbitrary and/or capricious action.

In viewing the situation in the Walker incident and in noting that there is a dispute amongst the witnesses as to whether Walton actually pushed and/or struck Walker, I cannot find that Stevenson's decision to impose the letter of warning, instead of more severe discipline, constituted an abuse of her discretion. In other words, I accept Stevenson's conclusion that the evidence was not sufficient to establish that Walton struck or pushed Walker. I reach this conclusion not only from considering Stevenson's analysis, but also from my own review of the evidence in this hearing. In my view, if the shoe were on the other foot with Walton accusing Walker of having hit her, with witnesses on both sides, the Union would surely argue that the Service failed in their burden of proving such a serious charge.

The fact that Stevenson did find some basis for Walker's grievance and the fact that Walton was disciplined for her conduct did weaken the Union's contentions that a stronger disciplinary action should have been applied.

Because I didn't find the evidence sufficient to establish that Walton pushed and/or hit Walker, I do not find nor conclude that Walton's conduct vis a vis Walker was so serious as to have constituted a violation of the Joint Statement.

Therefore, in considering Walker's grievance on its own terms, separate and apart from the other two grievances,
I cannot find nor conclude that the failure to have given her more discipline constituted a violation of the collective bargaining agreement, postal regulations and/or the Joint Statement.

Turning next to Eddie Reed's grievance, I note that the evidence seemed to indicated that Walton did inappropriately raise her voice to Reed. On the other hand, I was not persuaded that her conduct was as serious as characterized by the Union.

In this regard, I note that while I do not necessarily condone supervisors raising their voices when speaking with their subordinates, I acknowledge that at times disagreements between supervisors and carriers occur when negotiating additional time for purposes of over-time. While I agree that carriers and/or supervisors should not be disrespectful to each other, nevertheless one must view the words and actions in each situation in order to determine the inappropriate nature and/or the seriousness of this conduct.

Again, while I understand the Union's arguments that their members should not be subjected to being berated and yelled at by their supervisors and that such conduct might possibly lead to serious consequences in the work place, nevertheless, in having viewed the evidence in this particular case, I did not find that Walton's conduct constituted so serious misconduct which requires affirmative relief by the undersigned. Here again, while I agree that Walton spoke harshly to Reed and Hynes, and inappropriately so, nevertheless, I did not find that the harshness in her voice and/or the body language that she used rose to the level as outlined in the Joint Statement as particularly egregious conduct.

In arriving at this conclusion, I have also considered the awards cited by the Union by arbitrators Hutt, McCaffree and Jacobs. From my review of their awards, it is evident that the conduct engaged in by the supervisors in those cases was considerably more serious and more egregious that the conduct in this case.

As noted above, while I agree that Walker's conduct was not as serious as characterized by the Union, nevertheless, I am persuaded that Walker could have, and should have exercised better judgment in her actions vis a vis these three individuals, Walker, Reed and Hynes, and therefore I agree that while there was a violation of the collective bargaining agreement the violation was minor in nature. Because I did not find Walton's conduct as egregious, calculated and intentional but rather as a transitory emotional outburst, I shall remand the question of corrective action, if any, to the Service.

Respectfully submitted,

Louis M. Zigman, Esq.
